MOTE DIPOE' 20 UNED

The idea of the American town so theorists, and cultural critics. Despite bein Arendt as a central pillar of American De America's urban history. My research this thought. I first wanted to understand the e essentially examining how it lost promine palace. I then wanted to understand if our community centers, cafes, and modern pla maintained any remnants of the democrat

To answer these questions, I begat squares in historical documents, with a parthroughout this process, I came to understivity action, lauded by ninthrived primarily because communication, and the process of the concentrate civicwlfating in the state of the concentrate civicwlfating in the state of the concentrate civicwlfating in the civ democratic action find a questions I undertook an Urban Placemaking in C nporary An focused on "creative place the mid-twentieth century."

٢

individuals engage with available space in

I

Creative, there exist communities in whice some of the original spirit of the town square that deliberately encourage the communation conclusion that while space is not the only none is available, it can be a major positive democratic participation and we ought to Recognizing this potential, my research a and maintenance of communal spaces. We more important than ever that we strive to